

THEORIES OF CHANGE

If we bring resources and support to people working for grassroots development who are already working towards community-driven solutions and are deeply connected to their community's needs, then we can collectively achieve a longer-lasting, higher quality impact.

If we channel capital to communities of women and women-led organizations, then our impact will go deeper and reach further. Research shows women are more likely to spread wealth around by focusing primarily on family needs, education, and community development.

If we structure responsible volunteer opportunities that put communities first, we can not only create genuine, sustainable impact for those communities, we can also offer more authentic projects for volunteers to engage with in both ethical and meaningful ways.
